14. In Surpluses the third sentence is a repeat of one in the introduction section. I don't know, there is just so much data here, being so minimal and repeating yourself seems a bit daft...
15. In surpluses, we don't currently compare them with the total transport net expenditure (except nationally). In Scotland and Wales we did however. Do you want me to pull the council level data in for that as well and do the same for England?
16. In Budget surplus comparison : wouldn't it be cool to see the budgeted and realised surpluses for each council? And the proportion difference?
17. The sentence

“The London boroughs, with their larger incomes, were more likely to have large excess surpluses compared with budget.”

Is problematic, no? I mean just because they have larger incomes doesn't mean they are bad at budgeting? Anyway, even if you think so, it's still a tricky sentence to leave in in case there comes a day when London boroughs get better at writing their budgets, and this isn't sth that can really be automated. Should I throw it out?
